

Later that evening Rabbit's fellow security workers threw an angry animal out through the fire exit.

The angry animal stood outside snapping threats. The other security workers stayed inside, taunting the animal through the door.

Rabbit stepped outside to deal with the angry animal alone. He treated him kindly and with respect, but would never agree to let him back inside. The animal eventually left. This is how things had been done at the Sloth's bar.

Months passed. The Rabbit had come to feel at home at the Antelope's club. His fellow employees had become his closest friends. He spent his nights off there. He performed there on a regular basis. They all spent their holidays together at the bar.

Out of all the animals that he worked with, there were only three that Rabbit did not feel comfortable around, besides the Squirrel whom he did not like.